These recent discoveries (yet to be confirmed) reminded me once more of that eccentric and oft dismissed Dutch-German polymath and thinker Herman Felix Wirth (1885 - 1981). As discussed elsewhere on this blog in relation to photography and a mytho-spiritual and racial interpretation of humankind's origins, the notion of a polygenetic origin or at least alternative monogenesis of mankind is not ...

Hermann Wirth (1885-1981) was a Dutch historian who became one of the co-founders of Himmler's Ahnenerbe-SS. He was obsessed with Atlantis and sought to prove that it had existed in the North Atlantic where he believed that it had stretched from Iceland to the Azores. He thought that the only parts of Atlantis to remain above water after its submergence were Cape Verde and the Canary Islands.
