Language and Translation in Postcolonial Literatures: Multilingual Contexts, Translational Texts. The role of translation and an awareness of the multilingual spaces in which many postcolonial texts are written are fundamental issues with which postcolonial studies needs to engage in a far more concerted fashion.

Language. "... make language stammer, or make it 'wail,' stretch tensors through all of language, even written language, and draw from it cries, shouts, pitches, durations, timbres, accents, intensities." – G. Deleuze and F. Guattari, A Thousand Plateaus Language is often a central question in postcolonial studies.

In postcolonial countries of Africa, the Africans and the non-Africans live in a world of genders, ethnicities, classes and languages, of ages, families, professions, religions and nations. There is a suggestion that individualism and postcolonialism are essentially discontinuous and divergent cultural phenomena.

In postcolonial discourse, language is not neutral and thus translation can never be impersonal. Postcolonialist critics highlight that the translator needs to take the larger framework of power relations into account and neglecting the sociocultural background of the text is considered a major problem in postcolonial studies.

Postcolonial Translation Theory. The central intersection of translation studies and postcolonial theory is that of power relations. Tejaswini Niranjana 's Siting Translation: History, Post-structuralism, and the Colonial Context presents an image of the post-colonial as 'still scored through by an absentee colonialism' (Niranjana 1992: 8).
