Uncontrolled releases of Tigris and Euphrates River waters after the 2003 war have partially restored some former marsh areas in southern Iraq, but restoration is failing in others because of high soil and water salinities. Nearly 20% of the original 15,000-square-kilometer marsh area was reflooded by March 2004, but the

The marsh dwellers never paid any taxes and they received hardly any government services. Medical services were minimal and, like many traditional societies, marsh dwellers resorted to herbs to treat ailments. Schools were difficult to build because of the dispersion of the marsh dwellers in large areas separated by bodies of water.
