The religious wars in Europe lasted from roughly 1540 to 1700. Although they always had political causes as well, religion usually provided the passion and the chief justification for the fighting. Religious persecution was practiced in virtually every Western country until after 1700.

The Secularization of the West

McLeod, Secularisation in western Europe, argues that 'rather than one simple story-line, we need a narrative in which a variety of plots and sub-plots are intertwined', p. 286. Martin, On secularization , p. 3, proposes, in place of secularization as 'a once-for-all unilateral process', a model of 'successive Christianizations followed by or accompanied by recoils'.
